Easter Island SURPRISE

WITH great deliberation, Dr. Roberts studied the strange manuscript. It was written in crabbed English, by a hand that was seemingly unused to writing. That was obvious. Oddly, too, the capital letters ran below the lines—or what would have been lines of script in the regular sense. But in this case there were no lines because the words were written on a piece of badly tanned animal skin.

Dr. Roberts turned the skin this way and that, inspecting it with a powerful glass. It was old. How old, he couldn't tell. Perhaps a century, or maybe two.

From whence had it come?

Dr. Roberts laid the skin down and leaned back in his chair. He closed his eyes for a moment. There was no figuring this thing out. He and his daughter, Martha, had gone on a week's hunting trip back in the hills above Monterey. On the beach one day, Martha had picked up an odd-shaped bottle, made of some metal that defied analysis.

Martha had hurried to her father with her find. Inside the bottle was the manuscript, which perhaps had come from some distant shore.

Now, weeks later, the mystery of its origin still remained unsolved.

Dr. Roberts kept his eyes closed and let his imagination run.

"Still up a tree, Doctor?"

Darrel Dane had entered unannounced. Now he stood grinning before Roberts. The latter smiled back.

"Yes, Darrel," he said, "the thing has me stumped. I presume I should take it to the museum and let Hackett work on it. He's an expert on these things. But I don't want to."

Darrel nodded. "I get you. Think it may be something big that you wouldn't want to leak out. Well, it might really be at that." Darrel picked up the skin.

"Where's the bottle?" he asked.

Dr. Roberts reached into a drawer and lifted the strange bottle out. It was very light. He held it toward Dane, and the young man took it.

"Hm," Darrel said, turning the bottle over and over. "You know what, Doctor! This material looks like stuff we found on Easter Island in '42—a kind of light lava. Some of those mysterious statues on the island are carved out of it."

Dr. Roberts leaped to his feet. "Then why didn't you say so before?" he asked.

Darrel grinned. "I didn't realize it before. The thought just came to me." He eyed the Doctor with a smile playing on his lips. "This'll probably mean a trip to Easter Island, if I know your penchant for tracking things down."

"You're right," the Doctor said. "Can you be ready to leave tomorrow?"

Darrel nodded. "Taking Martha along, Doctor?"

"Try to leave her behind," Dr. Roberts snorted.

In the morning the trio left for San Pedro, where the Doctor had already wired to make arrangements with the owner of a large fishing smack to take them to the island.

Easter Island is a weird place. It is dotted with gigantic monoliths and strange statues, carved out of solid rock. Who made them, when they were made, nobody knows. The three adventurers had no idea what they would find on the island, but the composition of the bottle led them to believe someone had been there not too long ago.

Three weeks later they arrived off the island's rocky shore. After his crew had helped unload supplies, the skipper of the fishing smack bade them good-bye.

"What was that formula you were studying after Martha found the bottle, Doctor?" asked Darrel the evening of their arrival on the island. They were sitting around a gasoline stove, waiting while Martha prepared dinner.

Roberts cleared his throat and seemed to come out of a reverie. "Some means to reduce human cells to infinitesimal proportions. I didn't quite get the full significance."

Darrel said, "It sounds like my own little secret, eh?"

"Not quite," said Roberts. "You break down body molecules by power of will; this thing is a chemical process."

That night, long after Darrel and her father had retired, Martha Roberts lay watching the stars. At length she became aware that one star blazed up and fluttered, like a bonfire. She raised her head. Then she saw that the "star" was indeed a bonfire.

Her first impulse was to awaken the other two, but she abandoned that idea. Carefully she got up, slipped on boots and a jacket and sneaked off toward the fire. It was a mile or so away, near the beach.

Going closer to the bright flames, she discovered that it was no common fire; the brilliance emanated from a narrow slit in the solid rock walls of a low hill. It was flames of intense heat, giving off a green and blue-white glow, such as emanates from a furnace or electric oven.

"I wonder what's behind this," she whispered to herself.

She ran back to the camp. Dr. Roberts was up, having missed her in a wakeful moment. Martha called to Darrel. Both men were ready for action by the time she was half-way through her story. They dressed quickly and strapped on their weapons.

When they arrived at the rock slit, they peered through.

"It's a furnace, all right," said Darrel. "And there's a long-whiskered chap working over it. Maybe it's Santa Claus, though it couldn't be if this is Easter Island."

"Hardly," replied Dr. Roberts, taking another look. "I can see retorts and other paraphernalia in there."

"There's only one way to find out, and that's to have a look," said Darrel. "Here I go!"

Almost instantly, by great mental effort, Darrel Dane began to shrink his body. When he said, "I guess I can squeeze through now," he was barely a foot tall. Dr. Roberts and Martha, who had followed them, watched him disappear in the rock crevice. The Doll Man was on the trail!

Leaping down into the open space he found beyond the crack, the Doll Man looked around. In front of him was a well-fitted lab, and the man working before the furnace was the chap Darrel Dane had previously spotted.

As the Doll Man watched, the big man glanced into a sort of periscope affair. Then, suddenly, he whirled and disappeared through a door. Still outside in the space set aside for the laboratory, the Doll Man glanced at a wall case which contained many animals, all of them shrunk to minute size. A rabbit, for example, was less than a half-inch long! Countless other animals and birds were proportionately smaller.

"Hah!" said the Doll Man. "So that's his racket. He's perfected the shrinking process but tried it only on animals. Someday he might want human beings for guinea pigs!"

A sudden scream echoed through the crypt-like lab. The Doll Man rushed to the rock slit. Martha and her father had vanished!

"He's got them!" gasped the Doll Man to himself. "I've got to rescue them!"

Before he could move another door was flung open and a bony hand shoved Dr. Roberts and Martha inside the lab. They had undergone strange changes. Neither was more than two feet tall! Still, they towered a foot above the Doll Man!

Just then the bearded man came in, holding a hypodermic needle to his arm. His face was contorted with a wild leer.

"I've done it!" he cried. "I've done what no one in the world ever did before! I'll reduce the whole human race to atoms!" With a crazy laugh he jabbed the needle into his arm, and immediately he began to lose size.

Martha was screaming to the Doll Man to aid her, and Dr. Roberts looked utterly helpless. Both were now scarcely a foot tall.

The Doll Man couldn't help but laugh at their frightened expressions. Then he leaped toward a littered bench near the furnace. But the bearded man was upon him at once, reaching for a stone bottle with a label bearing fantastic symbols.

However, the Doll Man beat him to the grab. He leaped off the bench, picked up the hypodermic where the scientist had dropped it, and jabbed its needle into the mouth of the stone bottle, drawing upward on the pump.

Time was all-important. The bearded scientist was now less than a foot in height. So, too, were Martha and Dr. Roberts.

Quickly the Doll Man punctured the arms of his friends and shot the liquid into their flesh. He was taking a great gamble because he was not certain that this was the antidote. Yet almost instantly their bodies began growing.

Despite his size, the bearded man wasn't finished. Again he lunged for the bottle and knocked it out of the Doll Man's hands. It crashed to the floor, breaking and spilling all the liquid. The man looked at the evaporating puddle, then screamed and fell backward.

Taking advantage of a tiny drop of the liquid still in the needle, the Doll Man squirted it into the bearded man's arm. It seemed to stay his rapid shrinkage for a moment. He remained at about five inches in height. By now Martha and Dr. Roberts were almost normal.

The Doll Man bent over the midget figure of the bearded man and began talking.

In a high-pitched treble the little man answered that he was Igor Slavoni, a scientist formerly of Prague. He explained that he had discovered the secret of reducing body structure some years before, and had come to Easter Island to complete his experiments without interruption.

"I have won!" he squeaked. "Won! But now I will lose. You, however, have the secret of my formula," he said to Dr. Roberts. "You can reduce people—but you can never bring them back to normal. My precious liquid is all gone!"

The scientist, Igor Slavoni, was now less than two inches tall. He quickly became smaller and smaller. The Doll Man kept his own tiny form until the scientist had actually vanished into nothingness—an atom.

Then the Doll Man adjusted his molecules to their normal size and again became Darrel Dane.

They were ready to leave Easter Island as soon as the fishing smack would arrive to carry them home.
